pecesecce • eccesecs HARRY SOTHERN, GAMBLER.

OF THE DAY

From the Denver News. If you had asked Mr. Harry Sothers why he was spending his vacation at Port Natal, South Africa, he would have gravely told you that the Kentucky summer climate did not suit his health because it was too hot, and you might have suspected that the colonel was guying you, and you would probably have been right. Nev-ertheless the colonel would have been telling you the exact truth. Kentucky had become too warm for him. The immediate cause of this warmt for him. The immediate cause of this warmth in his old home was a slight disagreement with another gentieman during a game of cards, in the course of which he had been forced to use his pistol in order that the other gentieman might not use his. The old gentleman happened to be an ex-congressman, a man of rational reputation, of one of the first pened to be an ex-congressman, a man of rational reputation, of one of the first families of Kentucky. The ex-congressman's son received a Sothern bullet through his pietol arm. Mr. Sothern felt that the people, with that imperfect reasoning for which he had no use, blamed him for the occurrence, and knowing people as well as he did, he knew that their blame would take the tangible form of a lynching. He did not stop to argue the matter, but left for parts unknown until the people should have time to reflect.

me to reflect, Mr. Sothern had had the good luck to come out in a steamer chartered by the British government for the transportation of supplies to Africa. On the way out he of supplies to Africa. On the way out he had cultivated the acquaintance of the officer in charge with an assiduity that can be appreciated only by those who have made a long voyage in a supply ship. At first that gentleman, a lieutenant in her majesty's service, did not respond cordially to these advances. He had sized up Mr. Sothern at his first appearance as a missionary, He changed his mind a few days later. He was practicing with his pistol at the time with indifferent success. Harry Sothern who had been watching pistol at the time with indifferent success. Harry Sothern who had been watching him, suggested that his aim was too deliberate. The lieutenant turned quickly and handed the revolver to his critic, who showed him how it ought to be done. When they reached Natai the lieutenant introduced him to the people whom it was desirable for him to know. Just at this time the Matabele war was "on." After weeks of waiting he got his permit to join a bullock train which was on the way to the front where the fighting was going on. The main division of the British South African corps has just defeated a division of the Matebele army at Kraal, and had set fire to the villages around that place. set fire to the villages around that place. Captain Williams, with about thirty-five men, while pursuing the enemy, was led into an ambush and found himself cut off into an ambush and found himself cut off from all chances of escape in a small plain surrounded by foothills fairly swarming with the enemy. There was absolutely no chance for him. The pass by which they had entered was already occupied by the enemy. There was nothing to do but wait for help or annihilation. He dismounted his men in the middle of the plain among a clump of bushes and small trees. The natives circled around out of range, indulging in what seemed to be a war dance. "When I get out of this," began Harry Sothern, "I'm going into the undertaking business. There seems to be a good field for it here."

An old sergeant near by replied: "Oh,

An old sergeant near by replied: "Oh, no, you're not. When you get out of this you're going to heaven, if you've been a good boy. If these devils leave enough of you, you'll be a fit subject for undertaking yourself."

Harry did not reply. He had taken off his coat and was rolling it up to put under the head of a young ensign who had been wounded as they entered the pass and whom Sothern, amid a shower of assegals and bullets, had thrown across his saddle and had then galioped after the rest. He could see now that the boy was dying and it gave him a great throb of pity and of rage against those who had done it. He wondered if the boy knew his condition.

A few minutes later the young soldier was dead. Harry gently laid the boy's head back upon the ground, and then picked up his Winchester with an oath. The natives were advancing all around them with continuous shouting and beating of shields. The British soldiers were picking off the Matebele warriors with a certainty and precision that nothing could withstand. The natives broke and fled. With a ringing cheer the men sprang to their feet and fired and cheered together. Harry Sothern staggered back with a bullet in his thigh.

Captain Williams helped his men move the wounded to a more sheltered spot, behind the trees. Harry objected to the arrangement for himself, saying: "Don't bother about moving me back. Just turn hind the trees. Harry objected to the arrangement for himself, saying: "Don't bother about moving me back. Just turn me over so I can shoot. I've got an engagement to kill half a dozen niggers yet."

The captain laughed. Then turning to his men, and for the first time in his life speaking to them as equals, he said: "Gentlemen, let's sing 'God Sava the Queen."

Gertlemen, let's sing 'God Save the useen.'

Harry leaned back on his elbow and atched them with an amused smile. He ad seer a good many men die in one way not er. But he had never seen men at like this before.

the valley to the savages who liting like vultures for their prey oated the sound of the national rom the throats of men who knew would never sing it again. A Mae chief, who was captured a few as later, says that the 6,000 savages od awe bound for a moment before the ndful of men who were teaching them of easily how not to be sfraid of death. It is says that as they came across the valy for the attack he could see a man in paulettes (the captain evidently) taking ley for the attack he could see a man in epaulettes (the captain evidently) taking the loaded rifles from a wounded soldier who was lying beside him loading them as fast as the captain emptied them. And he saw, too, a man in civilian's clothes—the same man who had jumped off his horse to pick up a wounded man as they entered the valley—lying on his face and firing very rapidly. And every time he fired a savage fell dead. Soon the crack-crack of the Winchesters ceased, and there was nothing left to show for the superiority of the Anglo-Saxon race but a hundred Matabele warriors who failed to join in the war dance that followed.
